HIGH COURT (MELAKA) — CIVIL REVISION NO 13-1 OF 1998
SURIYADI J
10 AUGUST 1998

Civil Procedure — Contempt of court — Lying in court — Whether there was contempt in the face of the court — Whether procedures necessary in contempt proceeding were sufficiently adhered to — Whether contemnors must be given opportunity to reply to charges

Both plaintiffs ('the contemnors') admitted to having lied in court. They were found guilty by the sessions court and fined RM300 each, in default one week's jail. The case was called to High Court for revision. The issues were whether: (i) there was any contempt in the face of the court pursuant to the facts; (ii) the procedures necessary in a contempt proceeding were sufficiently adhered to; and (iii) the contemnors were given the opportunity to reply to the respective charges.

Held, affirming the order of the lower court:

(1) The contemnors had at the very inception of the hearing intended deliberately to obstruct or frustrate the administration of justice, found by the sessions court judge to be conscious, deliberate and a contumacious act. A perjury laced by an intention to obstruct and frustrate the administration of justice as in this case would attract contempt proceedings (see p 349F–G).

(2) There are various procedures to be adhered to by a magistrate or a sessions court judge prior to finding a person guilty of contempt of court. In this case, the procedure undertaken by the sessions court judge did not depart in any way from the procedures to be followed (see pp 349G–H and 351C–D).

(3) As this was a summary proceeding, which required instant action, so as to prevent the degeneration of the administration of justice, courts should not rigidly follow the time-honoured 'right of legal representation'. In this case, in spite of the court's unsympathetic attitude regarding a contemnor's right to legal representation, they were not only legally represented at the lower court, but were also sufficiently advised (see pp 350G–I and 351A); Kevin John Moran (1985) 81 Cr App Rep 51 followed.

[Bahasa Malaysia summary

Kedua-dua plaintif ('penghina-penghina') mengaku telah berbohong di mahkamah. Mereka didapati bersalah oleh mahkamah sesyen dan didenda RM300 setiap orang, jika ingkar penjara selama seminggu. Kes ini telah dipanggil ke Mahkamah Tinggi untuk semakan. Isu-isu adalah sama ada: (i) terdapat apa-apa penghinaan terhadap mahkamah menurut fakta-fakta; (ii) prosedur-prosedur yang perlu dalam prosiding penghinaan telah dipatuhi dengan secukupnya; dan

(iii) penghina-penghina telah diberikan peluang untuk membalas pertuduhan masing-masing.

Diputuskan, mengesahkan perintah mahkamah bawah:

(1) Penghina-penghina telah sejak pembicaraan bermula sengaja berniat untuk menghalang atau mengecewakan pentadbiran keadilan, yang didapati oleh hakim mahkamah sesyen adalah disengajakan dan suatu tindakan yang tegar. Sumpah bohong disertai dengan hasrat untuk menghalang dan mengecewakan pentadbiran keadilan seperti dalam kes ini akan mewajarkan prosiding penghinaan (lihat ms 349F–G).

(2) Pelbagai prosedur haruslah dipatuhi oleh majistret atau hakim mahkamah sesyen sebelum memutuskan seseorang bersalah atas penghinaan mahkamah. Dalam kes ini, prosedur yang diikuti oleh hakim mahkamah sesyen tidak menyimpang dalam apa-apa cara daripada prosedur untuk dipatuhi (lihat ms 349G–H dan 351C–D).

(3) Oleh kerana ini adalah suatu prosiding terus, yang menghendaki tindakan segera, bagi mengelakkan kemerosotan pentadbiran keadilan, mahkamah tidak haruslah mematuhi secara ketat 'hak perwakilan undang-undang' yang tak lapuk dek zaman. Dalam kes ini, meskipun sikap mahkamah yang tidak bersimpati terhadap hak penghina-penghina kepada perwakilan undang-undang, mereka bukan sahaja diwakili mengikut undang-undang di mahkamah bawah, tetapi juga telah dinasihati sepenuhnya (lihat ms 350G–I dan 351A); Kevin John Moran (1985) 81 Cr App Rep 51 diikut.]

Hillary D'Cruz (Raghbir Singh Norizan & Co) for the plaintiffs.

Suriyadi J: On 28 May 1998, the hearing for this civil suit commenced before the sessions court judge, with the issue of liability having been agreed upon by parties beforehand, in that the plaintiffs were liable at 10% and the defendants at 90%. What were left for the judge's consideration were the issues of quantum of damages for the general damages and the loss of earnings of the second plaintiff. When the trial began, the first witness for the plaintiffs' case was the second plaintiff ('PW1') himself, followed by the first plaintiff ('PW2'). In the midst of the hearing, relating to the whereabouts of the second plaintiff's place of employment, the learned sessions court judge concluded that both plaintiffs had committed contempt of court.

From the notes of proceedings, I could gauge that PW1 had admitted initially of working with the first plaintiff (PW2) as a mechanic, gainfully employed to repair industrial refrigerators at the time of the accident. He claimed to earn RM1,200 per month. After the second plaintiff (PW1) had testified, the first plaintiff's testimony followed, admitting having paid EPF, inclusive of overtime pay, for his employees. During the cross-examination, the first plaintiff alleged that he paid the second plaintiff's EPF, from May 1995 until March 1996. The defendants later called DW1, one Azmil bin Idris, who testified that the first plaintiff never paid any EPF for the second plaintiff. Having heard DW1, and realizing that PW1 and PW2's evidence were at variance with that of the testimony of the EPF's officer, and may have perjured, the learned sessions court judge

A adjourned the case. This adjournment was solely for the purpose of enabling the first plaintiff to produce the receipts of the supposed EPF payments made by his company. When the first plaintiff (PW2) was recalled, he did an immediate U-turn and confessed that not only did he make no payments for the second plaintiff, but also denied that he had employed the latter as one of his employees. The second plaintiff similarly turned turtle and
B corroborated this confession.

Having heard these confessions, and as it was lunch hour, the case was adjourned until 2.30pm for purposes of preparing the contempt proceedings. At that appointed hour, charges were respectively read to both the plaintiffs. The charges were separately read as it would be against the law to lump
C these contemnors together. The Malaysian legal and judicial system does not recognize group punishment, hence the necessity of separate charges, with their identities established (PP v Lee Ah Keh & Ors [1968] 1 MLJ 22). The charge against the first plaintiff reads:

> That you Bok Chek Thou in examination-in-chief stated that you made
D EPF payments in respect of Shahri bin Ahmad for the period from May 1995 till March 1996 and when the EPF records produced showed otherwise, you admitted that no EPF payments were made by you or your company named Yong Tuck Refrigerator Trading and you have therefore made contradictory statements in the witness box, in utter disregard for the truth, calculated to interfere with the due administration of justice.

E As against the second plaintiff, it reads:

> That you Shahri bin Ahmad in examination-in-chief stated that you worked with Syarikat Yong Tuck Refrigerator commencing four months prior to the accident on 26 November 1995 and that your working hours were from 8.30am till 9pm and when the EPF records produced showed otherwise,
F you then admitted that you only worked part-time with the said company and that you were in fact in the employment of Insulation Wall Industries Johor Bahru until October 1995 and you have therefore made contradictory statements in the witness box, in utter disregard for the truth, calculated to interfere with the due administration of justice.

G Matters were made easy when both the contemnors admitted to having lied in court. The first plaintiff admitted that he deliberately lied as he wanted to help the second plaintiff who was a poor man; the second plaintiff merely admitted but without giving any reasons as to why he lied though was in collaboration with the first plaintiff. Both were respectively found guilty, and fined RM300 each, in default one week's jail.

H This matter came to my attention through an indirect source, and pursuant to my revisionary powers, I called up the file to determine whether any injustice had occurred in the course of the contempt trial. The High Court can exercise its revisionary powers even if the information has come from a total stranger to the proceedings, more so if the proceeding
I was void for illegality. I am entitled to exercise my powers whenever I detect that a material error or defect in law or procedure had occurred, misconception or misreading of evidence, failure to exercise or wrong exercise of jurisdiction, or where the facts admitted or proved do not disclose any offence, or where judicial discretion was exercised arbitrarily or perversely (Caetano Colaco v Joao Rodrigues AIR 1966 Goa 32). It must be understood that any calling of a case for revision by a judge, must never be interpreted as a desire to interfere and intimidate judicial officers from carrying out their duties effectively, or to undermine them. This is so as judicial officers should be fearless when the situation warrants it, so as to prevent justice from being obstructed or denigrated (Karam Singh v PP [1975] 1 MLJ 229). I was personally conscious that I should avoid sending out wrong signals, and at the same time inadvertently encourage witnesses and counsels to be contemptuous of the powers of these officers. It was never my desire to declare open season for potential contemnors.

A contempt of court is an act calculated to interfere with the due administration of justice, and may be civil or criminal in nature. For civil, it consists of a disobedience to an order of the court, in circumstances where the disobedience is principally a matter which affects the parties to the case. As for criminal contempt, it is an act that is meant to bring the very administration of justice generally into disrepute. As in this case, a criminal contempt can be committed in relation to a civil proceeding.

It is trite that in contempt cases the power to punish the contemnors are summary, and contrary to natural justice, as the judge is the same judge, jury and witness. He is the witness as he was present when the contempt occurred; he like that hypothetical juror decides on the facts which he saw and perceived, and he imposes a sentence if necessary in a summary manner (Re Kumaraendran, An Advocate & Solicitor [1975] 2 MLJ 45; Balogh v St Albans Crown Court [1974] 3 WLR 314 at p 319). To wind up this paragraph, May LJ in R v Newbury Justices, ex p du Pont & Ors (1983) 78 Cr App Rep 255 at p 259 endorsed the subsequent statements from the case of Morris & Ors v Crown Office [1970] 2 QB 114, which reads:

> ... The sole purpose of proceedings for contempt is to give our courts the power effectively to protect the rights of the public by ensuring that the administration of justice shall not be obstructed or prevented.

To summarise, the disposition of contempt charges which is summary in nature, may be justified by the need to remove as quickly as possible any impediments or obstructions to the administration of justice as observed by the presiding judge. He is to nip and suppress the problem at the earliest of stages.

The powers of the High Court, Court of Appeal and the Federal Court to deal with cases of contempt, are promulgated in art 126 of the Federal Constitution, and s 13 of the Courts of Judicature Act 1964. Such power to punish a contemnor is clearly defined under O 52 rr 1 and 4 of the Rules of the High Court 1980. As for the subordinate courts, the relevant provision will be that of para 26 of the Third Schedule to the Subordinate Courts Act 1948, which reads:

> Power to take cognizance of any contempt of court and to award punishment for the same, not exceeding, in the case of a sessions court, a fine of three hundred ringgit or imprisonment for six weeks, in the case of a magistrates'

A court presided over by a first class magistrate, a fine of one hundred and fifty ringgit or imprisonment for three weeks, and in the case of a magistrates' court presided over by a second class magistrate, a fine of fifty ringgit or imprisonment for one week, to such extent and in such manner as may be prescribed by rules of court. If the contempt of court is punishable as an offence under the Penal Code, the court may, in lieu of taking cognizance B thereof, authorize a prosecution.

In spite of there being no provision in the Subordinate Courts Rules 1980 regarding the exercise of this power, it is established law that a court may effectively exercise that power. This is possible so long as the contemnor is given the opportunity of being heard, and the proceedings do follow the C procedural tenets of natural justice, with the exception of the necessity of the case being heard by the very judge who had cognisance of that contempt (PP v Seeralan [1985] 2 MLJ 30). In Qureshi v Qureshi [1971] 2 WLR 518 Sir Jocelyn Simon P at p 535G–H had occasion to say:

... But in my judgment, where a legislative authority by an enactment setting up a tribunal or other body envisages rules to be made governing the D procedure of such tribunal or body, and no such rules are made, the tribunal or body is not necessarily thereby disabled from performing its function. In such case, the tribunal or body acts effectively provided it acts in accordance with natural justice and to promote the objective with which it was set up, and possibly by analogy with the rules of procedure prescribed for comparable tribunals or bodies. E

Adverting to, and disseminating this relevant para 26, the subordinate courts may act on any contempt of court, inclusive of any form of contempt in the face of the court (or contempt ex-facie the court). The well established categories of criminal contempt are many, but for purposes of this case, I was only interested in 'contempt in the face of the court', briefly to mean F a contempt witnessed by and or within the cognisance of the presiding judge. He may thenceforth summarily deal with it. Abdoolcader J in Re Kumaraendran at p 47, pertaining this phrase, had this to say:

Contempt in the face of the court has been, in my view, aptly defined by Laskin J, in his dissenting judgment in the Canadian Supreme Court case of G McKeown v The King (1971) 16 DLR 390 at p 408 when he said:

'Contempt in the face of the court is, in my view, distinguished from contempt not in its face on the footing that all the circumstances are in the personal knowledge of the court. The presiding judge can then deal summarily with the matter without the embarrassment of having to be H a witness to issues of fact which may be in dispute because of events occuring outside.'

Lord Denning MR, in Balogh v St Albans Crown Court, said:

'So "contempt in the face of the court" is the same as "contempt which the court can punish of its own motion". It really means "contempt in the cognisance of the court".' I

The relevant questions that required consideration by me were:

(1) whether there was any contempt in the face of the court pursuant to the facts;

(2) whether the procedures necessary in a contempt proceeding were sufficiently adhered to here; and

(3) whether the contemnors were given the opportunity to reply to the respective charges.

Having perused the documents, I was satisfied that all the three relevant questions must be answered in the positive. The reasons become clearer, if the poser of whether lying in court is sufficient to be construed as an act equivalent to contempt of court, is resolved first. I begin by citing cases where witnesses refused to testify to legitimate questions. Lord Diplock in Secretary of State for Defence & Anor v Guardian Newspapers Ltd [1985] 1 AC 339, when settling the question of construction of s 10 of the Contempt of Court Act 1981, had this to say:

> ... it applies also to disclosure in response to a question put to a witness at the trial, where a refusal to answer the question if ordered to by the judge to do so would constitute a contempt committed in the face of the court and thus a criminal contempt.

In R v Montgomery [1995] 2 All ER 28 at p 32, the court there discussed the suitability of a committal order in a contempt proceeding, as against a witness similarly refusing to testify in a case. This uncompromising attitude may be watered down in certain circumstances, eg when a witness refuses to give evidence for fear of reprisal, when an answer to a question may tend to expose him to a criminal charge, communications between husband and wife during the marriage, and communications between a client and his lawyer except for criminal proceedings, etc (James John Lewis (1993) 96 Cr App Rep 412 (CA); s 126 of the Evidence Act, though not for communications between the press and the informants (A-G v Clough [1963] 1 QB 773; A-G v Mulholland; A-G v Foster [1963] 2 QB 477)). Similarly in a local case of Jaginder Singh & Ors v A-G [1983] 1 MLJ 71, Raja Azlan Shah (as his Lordship then was), when discussing Coward v Stapleton (1953) 90 CLR 573, endorsed these views (at p 73):

> It is only in a strictly limited class of cases that a witness can properly be convicted of refusing to answer a question which he has purported to answer ... that in fact the witness is declining to make any reply which can be properly called an answer to the question. There must be a manifestation in some form of an intention on the part of the witness not to give a real answer.

Now I briefly touch on cases where witnesses have deliberately perjured in court. The President in the case of Apted v Apted and Bliss [1930] P 246 at p 263 had occasion to say:

> ... Parke B in an opinion delivered in the House of Lords in Miller v Knox (1838) 4 Bing NC 574 at p 614 described commitment for contempt as 'a summary remedy for obstructions in the course of justice'. In a case of Smith v Bond (1845) 13 M & W 594 at p 596, Alderson B is reported as saying: 'Persons giving false testimony in court are frequently committed for contempt.' At a comparatively recent date, a member of the Bar who was party to the reading to the court of a false affidavit was held guilty of contempt and imprisoned: Linewood v Andrews and Moore (1888) 58 LT 612.

Lee Hun Hoe CJ (Borneo) in Cheah Cheng Hoc v PP [1986] 1 MLJ 299 at p 300 regarding this poser had this to say:

> The court has power to punish as contempt any misuse of the court's process, eg forging or altering of court documents or other deceits of the kind or deceiving the court by deliberately suppressing a fact or giving false facts. (Emphasis added.)

On the other hand, a few years earlier, in the case of Jaginder Singh, Raja Azlan Shah Ag LP (as he then was) at p 73, added a rider by saying:

> ... False testimony, together with a refusal to answer questions amounts to an obstruction of the administration of justice which is punishable as a contempt; false testimony, without more, does not. (Emphasis added.)

His Lordship opined that a false testimony without more, will result in that party or witness being liable to prosecution for perjury, whilst for contempt of court that false testimony must be supplemented by the intention to obstruct or frustrate the administration of justice. In other words, the supplementary factor must be present. By the enunciation of the principles laid down in Coward v Stapleton, and endorsed by Raja Azlan Shah Ag LP, it is now established that, to fall within the purview of contempt of court based on perjury, a witness not only must have perjured, but had intended to obstruct or frustrate the administration of justice. In the current case, clearly the witnesses had admitted committing those offences with the intention of helping the second plaintiff, without care to truth and justice.

Factually, it was incontrovertible that the first plaintiff paid no EPF for the second plaintiff, nor did the latter work full time with the first plaintiff. At the very inception of the hearing, both parties had intended deliberately to obstruct or frustrate the administration of justice, found by the learned sessions court judge to be conscious, deliberate and a contumacious act. To wind up this matter, if a refusal to reply to a legitimate question may attract contempt proceedings, as highlighted by the persuasive authorities, then a perjury laced by an intention to obstruct and frustrate the administration of justice, surely could not be construed otherwise.

Procedurally, a magistrate or a sessions court judge, prior to finding a person guilty of contempt of court, may be on safe grounds if these tabulated guidelines were to be adhered to, viz.:

(i) to have cognizance of, or to be personally conscious and aware of the conduct, remarks, act of refusal to answer to questions and/or evidence of the contemnor;

(ii) to record that witnessed conduct, remarks, act of refusal to answer and/or evidence of that intended contemnor. These notations will be a point of reference subsequently when the intended contemnor is required to explain the above 'contemptuous' acts or statements. It must be borne in mind that these are mere guidelines as it is not possible to particularize all the acts or statements which can or cannot constitute contempt in the face of the court (Joseph Orakwue Izuora v The Queen [1953] AC 327 at p 336);

(iii) in the event of any comparative evidence being made available, to show that perjury had occurred, such comparative evidence are to be recorded;

(iv) any apparent evinced intentions to obstruct and frustrate the administration of justice connected to that perjury are to be minuted;

(v) having concluded that a probable offence of contempt had been committed, the contemnor is to be informed of the court's desire to pursue a contempt proceeding;

(vi) when the contempt is committed in the view and presence of the judge, he is to order the offender to be detained by the police, pending the commencement of the contempt proceedings (PP v Lee Ah Keh & Ors);

(vii) that the proceedings be adjourned for a short while, if necessary, for a 'cooling-off period' or for purposes of permitting the judge to prepare the charge (Re Pollard (1868) LR 2 PC 106 at p 120);

(viii) when the proceeding commences, the charge is read out to the intended contemnor, with it having sufficient particularities, especially the perjured testimony, together with the evinced intention to frustrate or obstruct the administration of justice. If the charge is based on conduct, remarks or refusal to answer questions witnessed by the judge or which he has cognisance of, then those appropriate particulars are to be specified;

(ix) as this is a criminal proceeding (PP v Lee Ah Keh & Ors), the contemnor must be given the opportunity to answer the charge. This conferment of such an opportunity is essential, especially when a committal may be a possible sentence (Chang Hang Kiu & Ors v Sir Francis T Piggot & Anor; Re Lai Hing Firm (bankrupts) [1909] AC 312; Gamalath Ralalage Daniel Appuhamy v The Queen [1963] AC 474).

This issue of opportunity to reply invariably brings forth the consideration of the concept of the necessity of representation for the contemnor. One must bear in mind that as this is a summary proceeding, which requires instant action, so as to prevent the degeneration of the administration of justice, courts should not rigidly follow the time-honoured 'right of legal representation'. In the case of Kevin John Moran (1985) 81 Cr App Rep 51, Lawton LJ rejected the view that a contemnor had a right to legal advice. In strong terms, he opined:

> Sometimes situations arise in court when the judge has to act quickly and to pass such sentence as he thinks appropriate at once; so there cannot be any right to legal advice. Justice does not require a contemnor in the face of the court to have a right to legal advice.

(For comparison purposes, see also the case of Sheo Mandil v Emperor AIR 1939 All 5, where so long as the accused was in contempt, the applicant will not have the right of audience). In relation to this current case, suffice for me to clarify that in spite of the court's unsympathetic attitude regarding a contemnor's right to legal representation, not only was he legally represented at the lower court, but was sufficiently advised. On that note I will not proceed further on this point; and

(x) having given that opportunity to reply, and if admission is elicited, the court may proceed with the sentencing. If he has adequately explained his perjury/remarks/conduct, and/or reason for refusing to answer to questions, then he may be dealt with appropriately or even entitled to an outright acquittal (PP v Seeralan). Otherwise the sentencing procedure follows.

Having perused the notes of proceedings, I was absolutely satisfied that not only did I find the testimonies of the contemnors false, but clearly intended to frustrate or obstruct the administration of justice. The procedure undertaken by the learned sessions court judge did not depart in any way from the guidelines, that I have tabulated above. The messy defences or explanations were mercifully avoided when the contemnors freely confessed the perjury, coupled with their evinced intentions surrounding those perjured testimonies. It was on the above grounds that I refrained from disturbing the decision of the learned sessions court judge.

Order of lower court affirmed.
